RESEARCH INTERESTS

My research program investigates the fundamental principles of self-assembly in living systems, bridging phenomena from the molecular to the organismal scale. We employ an integrated approach combining experiments, mathematical modeling, and theory to uncover how emergent biological function arises from the collective behavior of individual components.

At the molecular scale, we study how multicomponent protein ecosystems and mechanical forces drive the emergent dynamics of the actin cytoskeleton. We use advanced biophysical techniques like single-molecule imaging and force spectroscopy to build a complete mechano-chemical picture of these systems. At the organismal scale, we apply these principles to the evolution of multicellularity. Our recent work in Nature Physics showed how hydrodynamic forces can drive colonial organization in unicellular organisms. Ultimately, my research aims to uncover the universal physical rules that govern collective behavior in biological systems.
